Western nations are seeking to restrict Russia's oil exports in response to the war in Ukraine. The insurance industry is waiting for answers on whether the new price cap on Russian refined product exports will be applied to delivered bunker fuel, according to Ship & Bunker.

The UK government will ban the provision of insurance for ships carrying Russian oil, the Treasury confirmed, cutting off access to the vital Lloyd's of London market for seaborne Russian cargoes.

- The EU is also introducing a ban on services like insurance for ships transporting Russian oil, and the US is set to follow suit
- Western governments are attempting to limit Moscow's oil revenues
- Russia has repeatedly said it will not sell oil to any country implementing the price cap
- The UK Treasury said it had established a new team in the Office of Financial Sanctions Implementation to set up the licensing and enforcement system for the oil price cap
- Insurance Companies will no longer be permitted to transport oil from Russia by sea, or to insure such shipments
